WITH TOM REEVES #908

Previous to 1988, I collected cut glass items and Ironwood Indian sculpture. I like to wander through antique malls and flea markets. In 1988, at the age of 61, it occurred to me that if for example green glass Coke bottles were selling for $8 or so each maybe I should start collecting something new at current prices which could become valued collectibles for my grandchildren years from now. It could also provide me with an interesting and novel hobby. Pop and beer cans appeared to be an inexpensive and diverse choice.

So where to start? Not knowing any can collectors or even if anyone was interested in cans, I started buying pop and beer cans off the local grocery store shelves. It was amazing how quickly the fever overcame me and the house rapidly became stockpiled. Sound familiar?

In vacation travel by car, air and cruise ship, I added dozens more cans from Mexico and several western states.

As my interest grew, I searched for books and data on cans and collecting of them. After much stumbling around and many inquiries, the NPCC and other similar groups came to my attention. Having joined the NPCC (and the Pepsi group) and having made a few trades, I consider myself a true can and memorabilia collector.

This past summer I was able to visit Stuart Wiley and Gabriel Romero in Mexico City and see their fantastic Coke collections. I also visited Dave Brackett in Fairfield, California and was totally mind boggled at his house and garage full of pop cans from all over the world. Wally Gilbert in Escondido, California also showed me his extensive collection. I met Jerry Watkinson in San Diego and bought several cans from him.

Having recently talked to Debbie Rose of Moraine, Ohio and made a trade with her, I've decided to try to limit my collecting to Pepsi and Coke while my marriage is still intact and I can still get my car in the garage.

Hopefully in the future I will meet all of you fellow addicts to swap cans and tell tales of the one that got away. Stop in if you are in Seattle.

Pepsi to dress up for the holiday season

Burger boycott: Burger King Corp. ran counter ads Sunday and Monday in several hundred newspapers, including USA TODAY, the Los Angeles Times and the Miami Herald. The ads state that when BK buys TV ads, it is "supporting traditional American values on television, especially the importance of the family." On Sept. 1, a pressure group, Christian Leaders for Responsible Television, launched a one-year boycott of BK for buying ads during shows allegedly featuring sex, violence and "anti-Christian values." Last week, the group called off the boycott after reaching a "mutual understanding" with BK. BK says the ads don't signal changes in its TV ad policy.

Funny ads by the BRDO agency will tout the designs. A print ad asks, "Who needs eggnog?" A TV ad features the Polar Bear Club - hearty swimmers who brave chilly winter waters for their dips.

Santa's appearance on the Pepsi products differs dramatically from the traditional Santa you've seen for decades in ads for arch-rival Coca-Cola. Unlike Coke's jolly old elf, the Pepsi Santa is a cool yule dude in neon red and green.

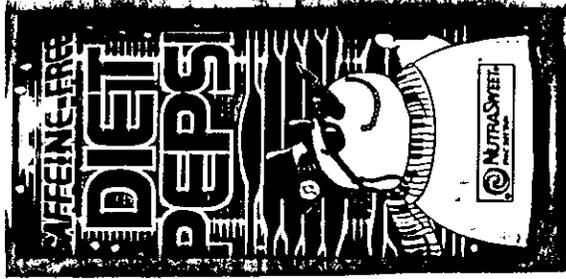

Pepsi is the latest marketer to bring out special Christmas-time versions of its regular products. The trend is growing faster than a kid's Christmas list, because it helps build sales.

Brands dressed for the holidays including Mexico and South Korea.

This Christmas, Santa Claus is going to be a pop. A soda pop, that is. Starting this week, you'll see Pepsi-Cola and Diet Pepsi in holiday dress. Pepsi-Cola Co. is calling the big yule promotion its Winter Cool Collection. On the way: seven festive yule scenes pictured on 12-ounce cans, 24-liter bottles and cups of Pepsi and Diet Pepsi. Among them are Santa in the tropics, hip snowmen, a pair of pen pals and the sheet music to "Winter Wonderland."

The collection follows Pepsi's smash-hit Cool Cans promotion this summer. Then, there were four special Pepsi cans in pop-art and optical styles.

The yule cans and bottles will be on sale through Dec. 31. Plans call for Pepsi to distribute 5 billion seasonal sodas in the USA and other countries.

NATIONAL POP CAN COLLECTORS VOLUME 90-3

BOOTH'S & BOTTOMS UP

This article is the third in a series on cone top soda cans, most of which were produced in the early 1950's. As we proceed through the brands in alphabetical order, please let us know if we are missing any brands, generations, or flavors.

BOOTH'S

According to a notation on the Booth's cone top cans, the company has been in existence "Since 1896". Two early "Booth Bros" embossed bottles have been cataloged. One is a clear glass Hutchinson bottle and the other is an aqua straight sided bottle. Both have pictures of the Liberty Bell embossed in the glass.

Four different generations of painted label bottles have been noted, dating from 1951 to 1966.

The soda was first placed in cone top cans by the Booth Bottling Company in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania about 1954. A lady's head is featured at the top of the can's label. Different skin colorations of the face account for three different cataloged generations of this brand.

It appears that sometime after introduction of the cone top cans, the company was sold to Frank's Beverages, also located in Philadelphia. In 1981, a tab top can with the Booth's label was sold by Frank's.

berg, a mob of creditors calling him a con man. "In my heart," says Duke, "I know that's not what I am."
Before the creditors' meeting, he stopped in on an old friend, looking for moral support. "Well," he said along about mid-morning, "I guess I've got to go face them." He stretched his face, drew a deep breath, and marched on the floor.

No one showed up. Feeling pretty beat up, Duke drove back to Atlanta, giving himself a pep talk. At least he had a job now. His former employer had hired him back in its Atlanta office. No, he couldn't go back to being the person he was before Cajun Cola, he reasoned. And he couldn't be Mr. Cajun Cola anymore, either. He needed a new identity, one that absorbed what had happened to him. "I don't want to be an old man, sitting in a rocking chair, saying, 'Remember The Wall Street Journal?'" he says. "I'd rather see something like that again. I don't think I'll ever see anything like that again, I need to heal."

And as Duke well knows—the holds a master's degree in counseling, after all—counseling is part of the process.

The sunny morning after the atrocious rains, I visit him again. He offers me one of the folding chairs. "I haven't really settled in," he says. Soon he is telling the Cajun Cola story all over again—in such detail, in fact, that he finds he needs props. His old diary would help. "It's in that closet," he says, pointing. But he hasn't gone in there since he moved in. It's probably a mess.

A little further along, he begins to wonder about some of the fan mail he received. It too is probably in the closet. And hey, he says later, do you know that Cajun Cola got a mention posthumously? In Life magazine's issue on the 80's? It's with some of his other clippings in... the closet.

You know, says Duke, hesitating for a moment, I think I'll go get it. He opens up the closet, grabs a box marked "Duke," and starts thumbing through it. Every once in a while he says "hmm" or "huh." Next he finds a croquet set. He drags that out and underneath—much to his delight—uncovers what he calls "the last surviving case" of diet Cajun Cola. "This might be worth something someday," he muses.

Out come posters, an alligator hat, a box of letters. He finds a laminated copy of his clipping from The Wall Street Journal, propped against the wall, and stares at it. "I don't imagine there are many people in Shreveport who've been on page one of The Wall Street Journal," he says with satisfaction. Then he dives back into the closet. As he unfolds and reads clippings, he begins to smile. There's a mock-up of a promotional ad he planned with a potato chip company; there's a table tent for a joint venture with a light concern, here, of all things, is the March 1987 issue of JNC, magazine. Next, he looks at a copy of the note he sent me. The one in which all the exclamation points reappeared. "I feel like I ought to hear the theme from The Twilight Zone."

For once his apartment is starting to look lived in. As dusk falls Duke comes alive. Did I tell you about my meeting with Paul Prudhomme? he says. Do you know I still get letters from people who come across Cajun Cola? Canfield still has more than 200 cases left, and distributors throw it on shelves from time to time. "A lot of people really liked it," Duke says. "People thought there ought to be a Cajun Cola."

He grows quiet again. "In bankruptcy, you feel like the lowest kind of person there is," he finally says. "You have to come to terms with the fact that the dream you went after does not work."

"A lot of what I did was acting on the best information I had at the time. I think I pulled together a credible group of businessmen each step of the way. Maybe people shouldn't have believed me. Maybe they should have made me wave money in front of their faces, and not worked on spec."

Duhé gets up, and begins pacing. "Everybody wants to be associated with a winner, someone who is making something out of nothing," he says. "These people don't want the guts to do it themselves, but they want to believe so badly. It's easy for a smooth-talking entrepreneur to come across as credible and believable. I was so convinced to my dream that I was blind to the fact that I had limited abilities. When you are in dream mode, you won't listen. But I wish someone had tried to tell me. People only stopped liking the idea when I couldn't pay the bills."

Duhé sits back down, a tired huffing. He falls dead silent. I wait a bit before I speak. "Looking at him now—his face drained, his body collapsed into the chair—I strain to see the Rick Duke who sent me that note just over two years ago. Back then, Duke always sounded like a kid on a ride, alternately scared and thrilled. As amazed as he was—Mr. Canfield told me to call him Alan!—he once reported—there was always a sense that he knew how things were going to turn out. One way or another, sooner or later, Cajun Cola was going to make him rich. Hearing read similar stories before, he felt sure he knew how this one ended."

So did I. "If that deal comes through," I always told him at the close of our conversations, "let me know so I can write about it." It never occurred to me that that deal might never come through, that Rick Duke might fall. Intellectually, of course, I knew that business failed, that people lost fortunes, that dreams dissolved. But failures, by the time I hear about them, have already been assigned a greater purpose. How many CEOs have I heard chuckle about that first company, that early shin strap they took? That's where they learned never to take on a partner again, or always to check on sales.

But now I wonder, at the time, did their failures feel like this?

People who start businesses know, deep down, that they are as vulnerable as Rick Duke, who sits struggling to explain his failure to himself, to understand it in a way that allows him to move on with his life. And all of us who talk about failure as an opportunity, a magnificent learning experience, are really trying to blot out a hard truth about entrepreneurship. In becoming calloused to the risks involved—as if merely talking about failure will bring it upon us—we prevent that starting a business is just another way to make a living. But failure hurts. It takes a toll. And I find myself mourning that voice on the phone, the Rick Duke who was always on the verge of a big deal, who always had a great line. "Cajun Cola is like Rollercoaster!" he once said. "Just won't go away."

In his own time, Duke may come to understand that it was not he who failed. It was his business.

Hey, I don't know about you, Duke suddenly interrupts, but I could use something to drink.

He gets up and waves his way through all the memorabilia, careful not to disturb the Cajun Cola museum. I hear him crack an ice tray. A pop pops. He returns with two glasses of soda. Raising his glass—it is filled with Cajun Cola—he proposes a toast. "Here's to the last interview I ever give about this."

Then he closes his eyes and takes a big gulp. "Tell me the truth," he says. "Do you think it's too spicy?"

HOT PRODUCT, COLD WORLD the story of Cajun Cola, continued from November. From INC. MAGAZINE, submitted by Sam Detina #172.

23 hours each way to meet with a local distributor in Toronto. Finally, in November, he landed a retailer with furniture and a kick-up truck with Cajun Cola and headed to New Orleans. Maybe the tourists would go for it. "I figured, if you're going broke in Shreveport, why not go broke in New Orleans?" he says. No matter where he went, Duhe, a business novice, was coming toe-to-toe with one of commerce's harshest lessons. For a brief time he had managed to patch together a coalition, a group of people united by their true interest in Cajun Cola. Some had dropped out, but a core group stood by him. He called them his "friends." Sure, they liked him. But they had their own reasons for being involved: Canfield wanted to produce the concentrate, Eisenberg wanted national exposure, and Bozell wanted a lucrative retail outlet. When it looked like none of them would get what they came for, they turned on Duhe. "I felt deserted," he says.

Media inspired and media driven, Cajun Cola had always found an ally in the press. Then, on November 14, 1988, the media disembarked from the Cajun Cola bandwagon. Send Spicy Cajun Cola South," read the Shreveport Journal. Duhe, feeling betrayed, vowed that "if I could have gotten away with hurting the reporter physically, I would have."

Get to New Orleans. Show them all.

Six months after appearing on the front page of The Wall Street Journal, Rick Duhe moved into a small spare bedroom at his aunt and uncle's house in a New Orleans suburb. One night, bringing awake on his twin bed, he calculated that he was $100,000 in debt, not counting his own salary. The next morning he loaded his car with Cajun Cola and set off to find somebody who might be interested in carrying it. Rovermont restaurants, independent grocers, T-shirt shops. Some days, he'd sell it at a loss because he needed pocket cash.

Every once in a while, one of his creditors would track him down. They didn't want to hear about the next big deal. "There was always a deal that was going to happen next week," says Eisenberg—or the new potential investor. They wanted their money. "People that seem warm and fuzzy at one time stop being that when you can't pay them." Duhe observes. "When your company is going downhill, and you can't tell people when you'll be able to pay them, what kind of dialogue can you have?" Betrayed and isolated, Duhe was feeling lonelier than ever. By March 1989 Duhe had sold his inventory of Cajun Cola and wasn't in any position to buy more from Canfield. "I just wanted my sanity back," he says. "I wanted a normal life again." No more meetings. No more interviews. No more hope.

Rick Duhe just wanted to go home. "OK, MOM," RICK DUHE SHOUTS INTO the phone. "Well, I hope you are having a glorious birthday evening. The thunder is so loud that Duhe's voice can hardly be heard; lightning has knocked out his connection twice. Each bolt seems to grow brighter and brighter, illuminating his small living room. There isn't time to see a broken wicker rocking chair, a rowing ergometer, a rickety card table, and two folding chairs. A six-pack of Cajun Cola sits on the mantle, each can turned so that it faces out in perfect alignment—a trick Duhe learned in the soda business.

Hanging up the phone, Duhe welcomes me in and offers me a seat. He is greatly relieved that neither of his parents mentioned Cajun Cola. Even now, in April 1990, nearly a year after his bankruptcy, his dad will usually ask, "Has anything happened with it?" What he's really asking, as Duhe knows, is whether they will see any of their money again. Duhe has asked me not to reveal how much they've invested; he wants to spare them further embarrassment. Suffice it to say that they've invested far more than anyone else. "I know the money was given out of love, but something like this can tarnish your relationship with your parents," Duhe says softly. "It's more me than them. I don't think I'll ever feel OK about who I am until I pay them back."

Of course, they wanted to protect him. But they couldn't do much. Last July his mother sent him a clip from the local newspaper. "Thought you'd better read this, she wrote in

BOTTOMS UP

All of the Coca-Cola collectors can "drool" over Bottom's Up cone top cans. They were filled by the Tri State Flavor Company which was a division of the Quaker State Coca-Cola Bottling Company of Butler, Pennsylvania.

To save money, the first generation of Bottom's Up was a generic type can with the flavor on the cap instead of on the face of the can. A second generation can followed with the flavor actually printed on the can's label.

No other cans beyond the production of the cone tops are known to exist, but at least four generations of 8 ounce bottles dating from 1956 to 1974 have been cataloged.

He couldn't be Mr. Cajun Cola anymore. He needed a new identity, one that absorbed what had happened. 'I don't want to be an old man saying, Remember 1988? Remember The Wall Street Journal?' That was over.

Traditionally this time of the year there is a slow down of new can releases and activity between the soft drink giants. As the holiday season is now among us and 1990 rapidly closing, the "COLA WARS" have returned. Pepsi is hitting hard in North America with their version of the pop art cans while Coke is releasing various promotional cans and sets around the rest of the world.

The Pepsi Winter Cool Collection consist of:

- Pepsi Diet Pepsi
- Santa Swimming Snowman with surfboard
- Winter Wonderland Santa with diet logos
- Pepsi House Penguins

Diet Caffeine Free Pepsi Total of seven in all.

- Pepsi Pride of Philadelphia 16 can set has been released in the Philadelphia area according to Bud
Frank and the 16 cans in the set are as follows:
Germantown West Philadelphia
Upper Darby South Philadelphia
Wilmington Bucks County
Fishtown The Main Line
Cape May North Philadelphia
Cherry Hill Haddonfield

Tennessee's (Volunteers) All Time Greats have hit the stores in eastern Tennessee on Pepsi. Geff Moore will keep us posted on how many there will be in this set. There are at lease three different and we will have them for you next month.

Who is Fido Dido? He has now made appearances in Texas and Chicago on Lemon-Lime Slice and Diet.
Gunnar Foerstel first reported his appearance in Canada on 7 Up and now he is south of the border.

Are there any US Coke Santa sets out this year?
There have been no reports on any sightings
however there is a 6 can Santa set being released in South Africa this season. In keeping their word, Maurice Hoogsteden informed us during the summer that new sets will appear every two months.

Next month we will feature all the cans submitted for the contest/drawing. The response has not been what we had hoped for, but some lucky member will win a FREE night's stay during the Can-Vention next summer. Mail your 6 cans and entry form early to avoid the Christmas rush and make your plans TODAY to this NPCC event. (For contest/drawing details, see page 5.)
